LINGUISTIC AND CULTURAL DEPENDENCY

The emergence of dependence theory was triggered off by the establishment of the United Nations Economic Commission for Latin America (ECLA), which was started in 1948, under the directorship of Raoul Prebisch, to implement the U.N technical assistance to Latin American countries. It deals with the economic analysis of the state of underdevelopment in the Third World Countries. Underdevelopment is seen by dependentists as a by-product of global capitalism. Specifically, the present state of underdevelopment is seen as having been created by processes such a colonization, and accompanying exploitation of mineral, agricultural and human resource which created development in the capitalist first World and the incorporation of Third World economy in the international economic system. It views the world as being totally dominated by the industrialized capitalist countries through the multinational corporations.

According to the dependency theory, the integration of the Third World countries into the network of the international capitalism (as advocated by its predecessor, the "orthodox" or "modernization school") did not lead to development because of the unequal partnership between developed and developing countries.

The world, according to the dependency theory, is divided into two: the centre, which is composed of the industrialized capitalist countries and the periphery, which includes all the developing countries especially those in Africa, Latin America, the Caribbean and Asia. One major characteristic of the economies of the developing countries is that they are dependent on the sale of their raw materials for most of their income and foreign exchange, yet the prices of these commodities are decided at the centre. Developing countries are, therefore, price takers. The same can be said of economic, political, cultural and technological advancements.

This situation whereby the periphery countries are subjected to decisions taken outside their area of control is dependency. It affects not only the economies of the less developed countries, but also their very political autonomy. As Prebisch puts it, "the consequence is that due to exterior pressure, the country cannot decide autonomously what it should do or cease doing."

Early dependencies did not give due consideration to the role of language and cultural forms of dependency. These forms of dependency, have, however, been discussed by Africanists such as Mazrui (1980) and Johnson (1980). Mazrui has, for example, made a distinction between structural dependence which has to do with economic, military and political dependence, and cultural dependence which affects "value, tastes, skills and ideas".

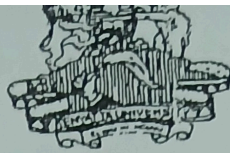

Linguistic and Cultural Dependency.

Images of an apartment block caving in and leaning on a nearby building in Kinoo, Kiambu, have rekindled debate about whether investors and contractors observe safety standards. It also shines a spotlight on building industry players because such cases expose the public to risk of injury, death and loss of property. The collapse of buildings should be treated as a serious offence, especially because some investors and contractors often cut corners, in the race to reduce construction costs.

Cases of builders using sub-standard materials or failing to observe building rules and regulations are all too common. In many instances, some investors fail to engage civil engineers as required by law, citing high costs. Yet, by ignoring this requirement, they expose themselves to the risk of losing their investment while also endangering the lives of construction workers and those who eventually occupy such buildings.

Whereas the National Construction Authority and counties should be more robust in inspecting projects, they approve, it still behooves owners and contractors to ensure they follow not just the law, but also the building code. In instances where buildings collapse, investigative agencies must be seen to be taking stern remedial legal action. They ought to be seen prosecuting such offenders regularly, given that corruption is sometimes to blame for poor workmanship when officials are compromised to turn a blind eye to irregularities during construction.

There is also need for continuous training of construction industry players to equip them with knowledge and skills about best practices. And where licensed players are found responsible for collapse of buildings, regulatory authorities should deregister them and publish their names so that investors can make informed decisions when contracting. It should not be business as usual.

Although insurance uptake is low in Kenya, owners should be encouraged to insure their property against risks such as faulty buildings collapsing on others. This way, investors who play by the rules will be shielded from the bad decisions made by third parties. Insurance uptake will raise compliance, which is beneficial to the sub-sector in the long run.

WHY A LOT OF OUR FLAWS CAN BE TRACED BACK TO UNRESOLVED CHILDHOOD ISSUES

About two months ago, I received an email from one of our readers. He, let's call him Steve, said he was an ardent reader of Eve Magazine and wanted me to get our resident psychotherapist to help him figure out one issue that had been plaguing him. Steve is in his mid 40s, has a good job as a mid-level manager in one of the global firms based in Nairobi and by his description, he is not the worst looking man in the city. But despite being financially sound and well-cultured (his words, not mine). He can't seem to keep a woman.

"And I am not what you would call stingy. I make it rain for my woman." He wrote. Yet, somehow, the women always left him. From our email conversations, he seemed like a man who could carry on a conversation and even inject self-deprecating humour; a quality I know is attractive to many women. So, just like him, I was stumped. I asked him the next obvious question 'what the most common complaint from the women was. "I have been accused of not being affectionate. My last girlfriend said I didn't know what it was like to love. That I am selfish. How can I be selfish when I give them all they need?"

He would then go on to reveal that his parents divorced when he was seven and had never really lived in a two-parent household.

Well, since I am on Chris Hart or any form of relationship expert, I promised that I would forward his question to the psychotherapist and wished him all the best. After forwarding the letter to the relationship expert, it all but slipped my mind until a few days ago when, in my rather eccentric choices of reading, I came across a relationship study that reminded me of Steve. The new study by Baylor University put quite a bit about Steve's story into perspective. The study, published last year, in summation, showed that children of divorced parents, in their adulthood, showed lower levels of oxytocin hormone. Oxytocin hormone is also called 'love hormone'.

It is an integral component in bonding between two people. It is this same hormone that is released when a mother is breastfeeding her baby. It makes the two bond and triggers the letdown of milk. It is also released during sex, where it helps the sperm move. Research also shows that the more time one spends with their partner, the more oxytocin is released. And the more oxytocin you produce, the more you desire your partner.

Now see where the problem could lie in relationships if you produce less oxytocin? Adults who had dealt with their parent's divorce during their childhood were found to be less confident, more uncomfortable with closeness and were less secure in relationships – all recipes for disastrous unions. These qualities also extended into their parenting style, which was described as less affectionate and lacking in warmth.

So while Steve was probably doing all he could in his relationships, he wasn't accounting for the little fact that his parents might have royally and unwittingly screwed up his brain chemistry when they separated. What can Steve do now?

When I sent him the study, he would write back saying that reading through it was an 'aha' moment for him. That it was great to know that his flaws were not of his own doing.

"I am going to start therapy soon and work out how to rewire my brain..." he wrote
